Students share eerie stories of fourth-floor murder tale

By MICHELLE MUJELLER
Assistant Verge editor

The steep, narrow flights of concrete steps lead to a fourth-floor landing and a locked door. Beyond that locked door lies the top floor of Pemberton Hall, which some believe the ghost of a long-dead girl haunts.

On the other side of the door is a floor shrouded in mystery, the old fourth-floor music room where a girl was allegedly murdered by an insane janitor while she was playing a piano.

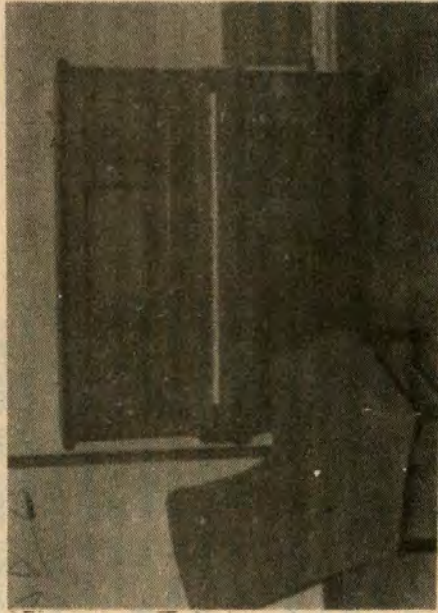

One room of the supposedly haunted floor does contain an old, battered upright, its keys stained red with fake blood from an old Halloween haunted-house tour. Pem Hall counselor Sandy Gallion said it is not the same piano as the one in the legend. Hall president Lisa Blackburn, however, said as far as she knows, it is.

That isn't the only disputed point in the legend. Residents of Pemberton disagree on nearly all of the stories told about the ghost, but there are enough similarities to suggest the stories are at least based on fact.

"There are some strange things that have happened in this hall, but it's an old building," Gallion said. In fact, Pemberton is the oldest women's dormitory in the state.

Some of the strange events have made believers of many residents. Blackburn said that as hall president she has use of a closet on the fourth floor.

She said that one night when she went upstairs to get some things from the closet, "I swear to God I kept all our keys so we wouldn't lose them," Blackburn said. After getting the door unlocked, all three keys were still on that hook, Blackburn said.

Residents of the newer sections of Pemberton complained of the opposite problem, saying they would lock their doors before going to bed, only to find them unlocked the next morning.

Pattie Carberry, a sophomore resident, tells of another mystery. Last year, she said, a girl was moving into her room when her mother noticed a small, black footprint that hadn't been there before. The print did not match the girl's foot.

As the days went by more footprints were discovered. They seemed to be the prints of someone tip-toeing across the room, and the prints proved impossible to remove.

Eventually a pattern formed. The prints led from the door to the closet and back out to the door. "They were still there when Carla (the resident) moved out. They just kept popping up," Carberry said.

An explanation given for the ghostly legend is the story of Uturpa Sharp, a resident who lived in Pem Hall many years ago. She loved to play practical jokes and scare the other residents, to the point that the other girls were terrified of her. Some say the legends grew up around Sharp and her pranks, and over the course of time grew into the ghost story known today.

The Uturpa Sharp story, however, does not explain all the strange events that occur today, nor does it explain the picture of a third-floor meeting taken recently that has a white, misty form in its midst. Of course, no one can explain that.

heard a note" on the old piano. She said she left and didn't return until the next day. "I think I'm going to get a new closet that's not on the fourth floor."

Many residents shared the experience of having their doors mysteriously lock or unlock themselves.

Blackburn said that in the old sections of Pemberton "our doors don't lock unless you lock them with your key," so it's impossible to lock yourself out of your room.

Despite this, many residents have complained of their doors somehow "locking itself."

Blackburn, now a senior, said during her sophomore year she and her two roommates went to take a shower, leaving their door unlocked and slightly ajar. When they returned, the door was locked.

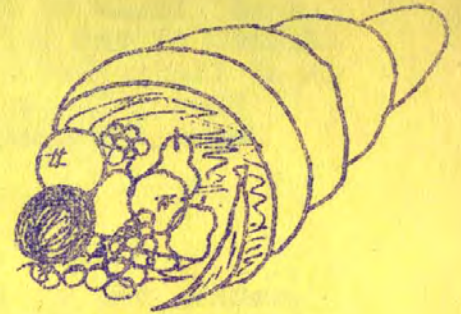

"We had a hook right inside our door where we

Learning is key to painter

LISA VAZZI
Staff writer

Gretchen Ives has tangible proof of her ability to be a china painter.

Ives, a sophomore from Newton, is one of few internationally registered china painters.

According to Ives, as a registered painter she can apply her own register number and sticker to the china she paints, making them originals.

However, Ives has not chosen to sell any of her own work, because each piece has been a learning experience, she said.

"I don't paint on a paying basis. I do it for myself," Ives said, adding that she'd like to start painting china doll faces.

But selling the china she paints is still an option Ives reserves.

Ives said the value of painted china usually increases each time it's sold.

"If people ever want to find out about the painter, they can look me up and find out my history in the book of internationally registered china painters," she said.

Ives added that "a vase can run from $300 to $400 easily. It depends on what kind of piece it is, the amount of time the painter put into it," among other things. Ives said a small plate can run from $15-25, but eventually most items increase in value.

Ives said it is difficult to say how much a piece can sell for because it "depends on the accuracy of the painting."

Ives said she does scenes and floral designs, a project which can take more than four hours.

However, despite her enthusiasm for the hobby, Ives believes the china painting trade is "kind of dying out," adding that "not many young people get into it."
